After several weeks of validation, EA SPORTS has given FIFA some praise for one of the aspects of the real-life player motion. One of the players in FUT 22 said, "I'm very happy about all of the new stuff they added to FUT since we got to play the new game at EA. It's nice to finally have a real-life simulation of the game we play every day!" We can assume this means for players who have collected real-life motion capture data from players, like Trey Scrivens of The Soccer Analysis, from real FUT games, the new engine will be able to not only capture the motions of these players, but also make their gameplay and stats more authentic and believable. A few other real-world sources have provided their input on FIFA 22 gameplay features as well. EISDUELLER, one of the best sources for FUT content in the world, has given their feedback on a few gameplay features of FIFA 22. The three most exciting gameplay features EISDUELLER mentioned were on-ball movement, line breaking, and dribbling, and of course, shooting. On-ball Movement "It feels, from behind the opponent's back, you should be able to knock the ball past the defender's line if you are very accurate and close enough," said EISDUELLER. "You should be able to do this with a shot, but in general, it would be a good idea to dribble past the defender while you are close to him, and use the opponent's back as a platform to knock the ball past the defender. I'm assuming that when you shoot that you have to have a solid contact point with the ball before you shoot, as it sounds like the ball will slip through your shots while hitting the ground first." See the Video Below Line Breaking "To break a line, you have to have a good technique in your breaks," said EISDUELLER. "You have to be on the balls of your feet while the ball is rolling between your and your opponent's legs. You can recover from the ball slipping through to your foot, but you're risking not having your leg in a perfect position, and you risk being open to the defender to finish a counterattack.
