I'm sure that there's a simple explanation, but I can't figure it out! A: Your query is doing an inner join between two tables (a "between two tables" to which nothing is assigned to) and that's why you get all 1 row. I think you want b7e8fd5c8

Sri Lanka won the ICC World Cup, Australia won the 2010 Ashes and South Africa won the Cricket World Cup, three individual events where a single winner is declared, but we don't get to see those individual victors. How do you tell the difference between an individual that beat the opponent once and an individual who beat the opponent twice? The ICC World Cup, the Cricket World Cup and the ICC Awards are three great events where the individual winner is never announced. There are also different reasons for these three events. The ICC World Cup is a biennial event in a four-year cycle, meaning that we don't get to see the individual winner for the 2nd edition. The same is true for the Cricket World Cup; though the home team wins in the main event, the individual winner is not determined until the final. In both the ICC World Cup and the Cricket World Cup, the event is played over different number of days. The ICC World Cup is played over only seven days, while the Cricket World Cup is played over a seven-week span. But there's a small distinction. The ICC World Cup is between the fully professional teams, while the Cricket World Cup is between all the members of the International Cricket Council. In both of these events, the final match of the tournament is always held on the same day, and that's what makes it easy to distinguish the winners. But for the ICC Awards, the individual winners are not declared on the same day. The ICC Awards are between the current and the retired elite cricketers. The ICC Awards are held about 2 months after the end of the ICC World Cup, and this means that the events are held in a staggered manner. Some great ICC Awards winners have won medals, but most have only gained the honor of being described as great cricketers. Please enjoy their achievements in their own particular way. A great sport, basketball is one of the greatest sports out there. There are a ton of different things that people can do
